

Published based on How To Send Money To The Philippines Before Your Vacation

How To Send Money To The Philippines Before Your Vacation

If you are planning a vacation to the Philippines area, you are probably trying to decide how to bring some money along since some nations have certain rules regarding some forms of payment. Before you visit, you should find out the best way to keep your money, and the most accepted types of payment. This way, you will never be stranded in this country without any funds.

The currency in this area is the Philippine peso, though certain parts of the region also accept the U.S. dollar or the euro. A U.S. dollar is equal to about 45 Philippine pesos, and you can plan to bring money to be exchanged into this currency once you enter the country. You may decide to exchange the cash at the airport when you arrive, such as at Francisco Bangoy International Airport or Ninoy Aquino International Airport.

However, expect higher fees at airports than with money changers in Manila. Two tips when exchanging your money in this nation are to bring larger bills so that you get the lowest rate, and count your money carefully afterward. If you do not mind carrying a lot of money around and can pay the exchange charges, you may not need to do a money transfer to Philippines using any other methods.

Many still like to use traveler's checks when on vacation, but these are not very useful in Philippines. In fact, most stores do not take them, and you will even have a hard time finding a bank that accepts them. So many people have become so used to other simple methods to make a money transfer to Philippines that traveler's checks just might be considered obsolete here. If you already have them, you can look for money changers that will accept them, but you should be prepared to pay a fee to cash them.

If you want a more updated way of always keeping currency with you in this area, a prepaid debit card might be your best bet. Many large cities and even most small towns here have ATMs, and most businesses do accept cards. However, there is usually a small fee connected with credit and debit cards, and a few tiny towns lack both ATMs and stores that take cards. For this reason, always have at least some Philippine pesos with you.

Of course, you can do so by visiting ATMs to take some money out whenever you spot one, which means that initiating a money transfer to Philippines on a card is quite useful in this country. However, do be warned that some ATMs in popular areas like Davao or Manila sometimes run out of money on the weekends, so you might have to search to find one that has money in it. Luckily, plenty abound in this nation.

We scoured every corner of the internet to find everything you ever wanted to know about sending money to the Philippines. Here is the absolute best source we uncovered, sendmoneytothephilippines.org

You can also find this article published on How To Send Money To The Philippines Before Your Vacation, and on the tag pages atm, cash, debit card, money, money to, money to the Philippines, money transfer, Philippines, send money, send money to philippines, Send money to the philippines, transfer money.